Sewing Circles

For the expectant mother, sewing and hand work are traditional. They occupy those hours when one must stay at home and give joy to the waiting. Lovely new maternity patterns (some with matches for your little girl who is anticipating a new brother or sister) are the easiest ever, with a new stretch-mesh available for skirts in matching colors, at your notions counter.

Ideal materials for mother are regulated cotton drippies, wool and synthetic blends for winter, and crisp gingham in seasonal colors. These materials stay fresh and pretty for hours.

For baby, the new flannelettes are softer than ever, the patterns prettier and th colors fast.

Save those plastic sweater bags (cut up for safety!) and sew together with a piece of terry cloth, binding the edge, for wonderful bibs. Even whole aprons can be made when baby is a little older.

Cotton seersucker, batiste and nainsook, organdy and silk organza (for baptismal dresses and those lovely picture dresses) are what to ask for.

Corduroy (pinwale) and cordana (a lightweight, corded material) are used for little washable coats and pants, and can be lined with flannelette.

Speaking of pants, have you tried the gripper snaps? The only tool needed is a spool for applying. But be sure to put an old magazine and sew down the second edge.

Thread your elastic through with a little safety pin and fasten by hand stitching firmly. Then if the arm grows, you can replace the elastic.

There is a thread-sized elastic which I have found practical to use only for hand work. This can be used to tighten old sweater necks and cuffs, and used in certain other ways to aid in fitting.

I have never had much luck with those threads supposed to be applicable by machine. If you have learned the trick, please let me know, and I will share it with the readers of Sewing circles.

TODAY'S HINT: A hunk of canning paraffin kept beside your ironing board is ideal for lubricating those ornery zippers. Just rub the wax up and down the closed zipper, then slide the zipper a time or two. Works like a charm.
